Entrepreneurs looking to establish their business operations in Maryland often rely on a clear understanding of state regulations and entity filing requirements. In today's fast-paced business climate, recognizing your entity in a timely manner means more than just getting a business license - it means securing funding, attracting top talent, and setting your operation up for long-term success. As business owners know, navigating Maryland's business entity filings can be a minefield of common mistakes and red tape.. According to data from the Maryland Department of Assessments and Taxation, the overwhelming majority of business entities in Maryland are registered as General Partnerships (GPs) or Limited Liability Companies (LLCs). However, for most companies, a GP or LLC won't be the right choice - at least, not at first. Before making any decisions about entity structure, savvy business owners should understand how each type can impact tax liability, investor expectations, and personal liability. Some business owners may be tempted to file their entity as a sole proprietorship, thinking this will save time and money. But in reality, a sole proprietorship can lead to a significant increase in tax liability and make it much harder to attract investors. Another common mistake is waiting until the last minute to file entity documentation
