a hue, trust the feeling, and watch the results roll in. In practice, three pitfalls dominate: Overgeneralizing cultural meanings. Many assume that red always signals excitement or that blue universally conveys calm, ignoring regional nuances and subcultural variations. Neglecting context. A bold orange might energize a fitness app but overwhelm a financial newsletter, yet novices often apply a single favorite shade across disparate platforms. Skipping data validation. Relying solely on “what feels right” without checking performance metrics can lock teams into aesthetic choices that never translate to clicks or conversions. These mistakes are amplified when the intuitive process lacks a framework, turning a potentially insightful cue into a gamble.
